Enrollment in and Attendance in Algebra Support and Student Algebra Grades May 01 2021

Many eighth-grade students have difficulty passing Algebra. Some schools implement an algebra Support course to help struggling students, to better understand algebraic concepts and to aid in homework completion. This action research study used a mixed-methods approach to determine if enrollment in or attendance once enrolled in an Algebra Support course were significant factors on student grades in Algebra. Interviews with teachers of an after school algebra Support course revealed common characteristics about students enrolled. An analysis of and algebra Support attendance grades in Algebra indicated that neither enrollment in nor attendance once enrolled in the Algebra Support course led to increased grades in Algebra. Interviews with the teachers of the Algebra Support course suggest the importance of student engagement as well as attendance in such a support course as a factor for improving grades.

Religious School Enrollment in Pakistan Feb 16 2020 Bold assertions have been made in policy reports and popular articles on the high and increasing enrollment in Pakistani religious schools, commonly known as madrassas. Given the importance placed on the subject by policymakers in Pakistan and those internationally, it is troubling that none of the reports and articles reviewed based their analysis on publicly available data or established statistical methodologies. The authors of this paper use published data sources and a census of schooling choice to show that existing estimates are inflated by an order of magnitude. Madrassas account for less than 1 percent of all enrollment in the country and there is no evidence of a dramatic increase in recent years. The educational landscape in Pakistan has changed substantially in the past decade, but this is due to an explosion of private schools, an important fact that has been left out of the debate on Pakistani education. Moreover, when the authors look at school choice, they find that no one explanation fits the data. While most existing theories of madrassa enrollment are based on household attributes (for instance, a preference for religious schooling or the household's access to other schooling options), the data show that among households with at least one child enrolled in a madrassa, 75 percent send their second (and/or third) child to a public or private school or both. Widely promoted theories simply do not explain this substantial variation within households. This paper--a product of the Public Services Team, Development Research Group--is part of a larger effort in the group to examine issues relating to educational outcomes.

Faculty Involvement in Enrollment Efforts Apr 19 2020

"As marketing to and recruitment of prospective colleges students is highly competitive in the higher education market, enrollment managers are constantly looking for an innovative ideas to increase new student yield for their institution. Given the highly competitive environment in higher education, the entire campus community including faculty must become more engaged in efforts to attract new students. With decreasing public funds and tighter budgets, senior leaders are more dependent on tuition revenue to meet fiscal obligations. With the rising cost of marketing and recruitment, are there other assets that enrollment managers can draw from? Knowing that faculty have a profound impact on students in school, can faculty members have a similar impact with prospective students? The research focus was to determine if faculty involvement in marketing to and recruitment of prospective students will bolster a higher yield of new students. The purpose of this study was to examine ways faculty involvement would augment enrollment efforts. In addition, an understanding of the level of support needed to encourage faculty to be involved in the marketing and recruitment efforts. Understanding that enrollment manager leaders are responsible for managing enrollment and faculty can influence students, could there be a blending of the two? The researcher conducted 11 one-on-one qualitative semi-structured interviews to speak with enrollment managers to discuss their experiences with using faculty. Using the interview approach, the researcher was able to examine re-occurring themes for analysis. The results determined that most enrollment managers are utilizing faculty for communication efforts to prospective students with a good level of success. In addition, enrollment managers cited that enlisting cabinet and other academic help was needed to encourage faculty to participate in enrollment efforts. The researcher has concluded that using faculty at key points with prospective students bears fruit. Enrollment managers should consider utilizing faculty in enrollment efforts if not presently. A recommendation for further research could be interviewing faculty and the ascertaining their feeling regarding any role they have played in the marketing to and recruitment of students" --Provided by publisher.
